kaleidescape media server

Your wish is this digital butler's command.

Kaleidescape's Media server system is one of the first landmark products in this age of convergence, an era that is supposed to unite the functional qualities of personal computers with the entertainment options offered by digital consumer electronics. Kaleidescape's system can store the contents of an entire DVD collection on a massive computer hard drive array, enabling you to access any movie, any time, without having to handle the disc ever again. (The DVD Copy Control Association—the DVD equipment governing body—filed a lawsuit against Kaleidescape that was pending when Robb Report went to press.)

The system is more than just a movie storage device, however. It represents an entirely new way of approaching disc-based entertainment. From the comfort of your couch you can sort through the hundreds, if not thousands, of DVD titles in your collection—even some high-definition video content—using a slick on-screen interface that presents cover art and detailed information about each title. Music storage will be available in the future. Choose a movie, and other title art will shuffle and dance around your selection to provide you with other viewing options from within that same genre.

You can search through titles by any number of criteria, including actor, director, or subject matter.

Once you select a movie and the theater lights dim, the black masking panels for a front-projection screen will slowly converge, perfectly cropping the image. The movie starts instantly, with no unwanted previews or distracting menus. All of these functions can be performed automatically in accordance with information for each title that has been downloaded and stored within the system. —mike wood
